An Approach to Teaching Challenging Syntax in EFL Classroom: Insights from Information Structure

Abstract

With upper-intermediate to advanced non-native learners of English, locating what constitutes demanding lexical, syntactic and discursive structures emerges as a worthwhile effort. For its optimal demarcation, such a package can benefit from Systemic Linguistics, syntactic theory, research on the good and autonomous language learner, cognitive linguistics, among others. What is proposed here is a re-articulated model in this regard, accruing from long-standing experience of teaching mostly advanced groups of learners with widely acknowledged success, far-reaching results and accredited effects, putting the main focus on the syntactic areas of challenge. Experienced teachers attest that, coached and instructed consistently enough, the student usually picks up complex but rewarding syntax quite reliably, enabled to deploy it in authentic contexts outside the zone of the instructor's presence and reminders. Although these are two separate areas, the manner in which the instructor monitors the learner's attention so that it is allocated variably to constructions requiring added attention, and the instructor's actual knowledge of these attention-worthy constructions, it is important to recognize that the latter constitutes an intuitive and necessary springboard for the former; awareness of what complex but native-like and rewarding syntax encompasses could be as important as, or more so than, how to teach them.
